Extraordinary Discovery in Egypt.

The interest of arch aulogists and Bible students has been excited by the discovery of a large number of mummies and a vast store of relies of antiquity in a cave in the mountains near the Temple of Deir el Bahari, about four miles from the Nile to the east of Thebes. The number of mummies is twenty nine, and they are all of royal and priestly personages who lived between the time of Abraham and the time of Sələmən. The identity of twenty six of the bodies has been ascertained beyond dispute by theirscrip tions upon the mummy cases, and there is not a doubt that the very Poarson who reduced the Liraclitis to brodage, and whose daughter drew Moses out of the river, is now lying in the Boulsk Museum near Cairo, where the curiosi ties have been removed. As that king is not designated in the book of Exedus otherwise than by the general name of Pharach, students of ancient E yotian history have been obliged to rely upon collateral evidence to establish his ful came and dyonsiy. He is considered to have been Ramses II., the third king of the pineteenth dynasty, and it is the mummy of this king that has now been found. The following is the description of it: "The mummy is in a perfect state of preservation, but of the three mummy cases in which it one; probably reposed, only one remains. This mummy case is of plain sycamore wood, unpointed and unvargished. It is carved to box contains one month's treatment. One dollar represent Ramses in the position of Osiris. The sox, or six boxes for five dollars; sent by mail crossed arms rest upon the breast. In the right prepaid on receipt of price. We guarantee six band is the royal whip, and in the left is the base to care any case. With each order received by us for six boxes, accompanied with royal book. The features are most beautifully and delicately carved, and are surmounted by the crown of Upper and Lower Egypt, with the u mas serpent. The mummy case is a most graceful and animated specimen of sculpture, dis playing, in all its purity, the firm and flowing lines of the period of the Exyptian Renaissance. "The nomen and pronomen carrouches of Ramses are written in plain black quaracters upon the mummy case, which bears no other text or representations whatever, and in its beautiful simplicity contrasts strangely with the rompous and exaggerated dedications of almost all other inscriptions which mention the name of Ramses the Great. The mummy itself is wrapped in rose colored and yellow linen of a texture finer than the finest Indian muslin, upon which lotes flowers are strown. One of the bands which pass across the shrouds to keep them in place bears a hieratic inscription point parties can send their orders and have stating that this, the mummy of Ramses II., prompt attention. was concealed in a pit at a time when a foreign army invaded Egypt." The cases of the other mummies present considerable variety in their carving and coloring, all being distinguished by the most costly and tasteful style of ornamentation. Several of the mummiss are queens and princess of ancient dynasties that reigned in Egypt.

There are also four papyri, or rolls of ancient Egyptian paper, covered with hieroglyphic writing, which may prove to be the most valuable part of the discovery. It is possible that they will throw light upon the history of Genesis and Kredus by confirming the sacred narrative of Israel's captivity in Egypt, or they may furnish new evidence that the nighest civilization of the world was in times which it is customary to call primitive, and that the savage state was not the original state of man, but that it represents a deterioration from the remarkable race of men whose achievements are chronicled in the tenth chapter of Genesis. The discovery was brought about in a simple way. One of the Turkish provincial governors of Egypt noticed in the early part of the summer that the sale of relics to foreign tourists was brisker than usual: so he arrested several of the Bedaweens, and by means which are familiar to Oriental justice extorted from them the infor mation that they had recently lighted upon a cave which contained the treasure. The gov ernor had the intelligence to telegraph the news to the Khedive, and he at once directed Herr Emil Brugech, of the Boulak Museum, to go to the place and take charge of what the cave con

The manner in which the relies came to be in the cave is explained by inscriptions in the mummy cases which record the fact that the priests removed the most precious of the munand well screned. I will be pleased to mies in tueir charge to the cave for security when Cambyses invaded and conquered Egypt in the yeer 520 B. C. The mummies were at least a thousand years old at that time and they is 7 have remained concealed in the cave 2400 years.
